Respect, Relevance, Reciprocity, Responsibility

I found the Culturally Responsive Evaluation course delivered by Reciprocal Consulting to be very useful and well delivered. The first half drove home the point of why we need to be culturally responsive, given that we are all operating from various paradigms, world views, assumptions, and different versions of the truth based on our colonial history. And the second half of the course gave us practical advice on how to overcome barriers for cultural safety in research, what traps to avoid, and what steps to consider in a culturally responsive evaluation from start to finish. The facilitators packed a lot of information and group interaction into the one-day course. I would recommend it to others and I bet the longer course would be even more impactful.

It was an invigorating and soul-queenching day of discussion and sharing for which I am truly grateful, both personally and professionally. Both you and Sofia did an amazing job of sharing your knowledge, wisdom and leadership with us all on that day.

As a federal public servant I have frequently been approached by colleagues unsure (and uncomfortable with their uncertainty!) on how to partner with Indigenous communities, organizations and governments on evaluations and engagements in general. After having attended your recent workshop, not only have I gained valuable knowledge and insight into improving my own approach to meaningful interactions and partnerships with Indigenous Peoples, but I have a clearer idea thanks to your wonderful example of how to advise others how to do so as well.
